Abstract

The majority of literature on the adult entertainment looks at objectification and subjugation of women. Women’s experiences in such arenas are negotiated through circumstances beyond their immediate control. In fact many find themselves in this profession out of destitution and need. The result of which is an experience that is even more harrowing, and psychologically and physically destructive. Previous research suggest that many women in this profession then find themselves in precarious relations, often turning to drugs and alcohol to deal with the highly negative aspect of the industry. However, what is not that often reported on are those women who decide to explore this profession out of mere curiosity or even as a career choice. This analysis aimed to investigate one area of this industry, namely striptease. With focus on the high-end (a more regulated and lucrative end) of the striptease spectrum, this analysis was aimed at investigating the phenomenological experiences of women in this sector. We look at the experiences of four women at one of the more prestigious strip-clubs in Johannesburg, referred to as The Club. This study aimed to provide some insight to why some South African women chose to enter striptease—as not much research has been done in this area. More high-end clubs seemed theoretically the most practical site to investigate such a choice. This study was based qualitatively, with the use of semi-structured interview which were analyzed through thematic content analysis. The results of this study are categorized into three sections and framed from an emotional labour perspective. Firstly, the experiences on these women provide a challenge to the traditional feminism perspective—exposing a dynamic power relation that may suggest that, within the high-end at least, women may experience a sense of liberation. Secondly, this study aimed to expose the emotional laboriousness of enacting a sexualised fantasy that is convincing. It was found that such an enactment requires an intense interplay between what is considered the real self and the embodiment and portrayal the girlfriend experience. Lastly, we look at the psychological defensive dissociation that occurs though this interplay between fantasy and reality. In essence this analysis has shed new light on striptease and has provided many new avenues for future research in South Africa.

Keywords: Striptease, Emotional Labour, Emancipation/Liberation, Feminism and Sexualised work.
Acknowledgements

It has been an absolute privilege to conduct this research. I cannot begin to express what a humbling and phenomenal it has been. With this in mind I am greatly indebted to many people, most of which I cannot list here. Therefore, I extend my greatest appreciation to everyone that has given me support to realise this project.

A special acknowledgement has to go to my supervisor Peace Kiguwa, for her utmost support and guidance. Her patience, enthusiasm and relentless commitment to this study was most inspiring and rewarding. There were many issues raised is the conceptualisation and completion to this assignment, were I was often confronted with many challenges and if it were not for Peace’s steadiness I doubt that this piece would have been what it is today.

I would like to thank the Psychology Department at the University of the Witwatersrand and the University itself for the opportunity to carry out this research. I would like to extend a heartfelt acknowledgement to Prof. Bridget Kenny (in the Department of Sociology) for her astounding wisdom and guidance in the formulation of the idea behind this research. She, too, is an inspiration to many. I would like to give a special acknowledgement to Dean Grisillo as well, as without him this study would have not been possible.

I would like to thank my mother, Mona Long, for all the love and support in this endeavour and for making sure that I “finish what I have started.” I would like to thank my father, Roland Long, and to my sister, Samonia Abrahams, my brother, Muneer Alexander and his wife, Famedhia Peerbux for all the love and support they have given to me in my research.

A word of thanks to my close friend Memory Mphaphuli for the hours of deliberation around the paradox of masculinity and the insight she has provided me about the value of my own gender normativity. I would like to dedicate Chapter 4 to my good friends Debbie Haselau and Gavin Holgate for all the effort spared in helping gather my data. To Patricia Hamilton-White for her unwavering support, thank you. To Hoosain Khan, for his contribution to my understanding of sex work in South Africa. Last but not least, to Holly Starling, Ané Kloppers, Khomotjo Tsebe, Mpumi Khubeka, Robyn Cruywagen and Heinrich Eksteen (Bra H). Thank you all for believing in me.

I would like to finally acknowledge Stephanie, Tanya, Miranda and Eva*. Thank you for the opportunity for me to share in your experiences and for the courage to contribute to this research. I was a privilege and honour to meet all of you.

* Fictional Names.